It has many goals, the most important of which is to promote personal and intellectual growth through poetry. The poems herein form a collection of English poetry that is eclectic (diverse) from every point of view. These poems range from early to contemporary, from well-known to less known, from easily accessible to highly challenging, from traditional to non-traditional. These poems also express attitudes from extroverted to introspective. Furthermore, the text of English poetry is fully multicultural, with many poems by women and minorities enhancing the students' knowledge and expanding the canon of English poetry previous taught in high schools, freshman, or sophomore years. Most students have a natural respect for and interest in poetry. Students have the innate capacity to enjoy techniques of poetic language – rhythm, rhyme, image, alliteration, or metaphor. If properly encouraged, most students would love trying their hand at writing their own poems. sophomore years. Most students have a natural respect for and interest in poetry. Students have the innate capacity to enjoy techniques of poetic language – rhythm, rhyme, image, alliteration, or metaphor. If properly encouraged, most students would love trying their hand at writing verse.

We teach poetry as a vehicle for helping students to appreciate the beauty of language and to understand the powerful effects of verse as a conveyor of message and meaning. Reading poems aloud is the only way to establish appreciation of the music that intensifies meaning in poetry. It is also an essential instructional tool for comprehension. Besides, memorization of passages is encouraged, and many students will find such memorization, or memorization of whole poems, enjoyable and permanently rewarding.
